Chapter 8
Maps: Translation

8.1 Map 1

The Cartographer dedicated this map to his Most Honorable Patron, the Most Illustrious Sir Antonio Vallisneri, Noble from Reggio, Primary Lecturer of Practical Medicine at the Arch-Gymnasium of Padua.

Most Illustrious Sir,

So that the rhetorical and physico-medical description of your mountain journey may be understood even by the foreigners among [your] readers, I send this Topography of the Province of Garfagnana: which shall be even more noteworthy, if, having been inserted and sent together with this excellent work of yours, it appears in it, and if the author is deemed worthy of acceptance; and I subscribe myself

Your Most Humble and Obedient Servant

Little Chronicle of Garfagnana
by Timoteo Tramonti, Chancellor of the Archive of Castiglione.
Manuscript Book 2.

Chronology of Garfagnana.

When Ogyges founded Volterra in the southern [part] of Etruria, this northern region was chosen by the descendants of G <…> as grazing land for [their] flocks; tents appeared in the peaks of the mountains: fortified huts, suitable to protect the 2Ogyges (Ὠγύγης). In Greek mythology, he was a hero from Boeotia and king of the Ectenes (Εκτένες), who were supposed to be the earliest inhabitants of this region. This myth is associated with the Ogygian deluge, a great flood which occurred during his reign. According to other myths, Ogyges travelled to Italy and reached Tuscany, founding several cities. On this topic, see Carbone 1840, 56–81; F. Inghirami 1825, 71, 83–84; Valeriani and F. Inghirami 1833, 25, 68.

3“Kitim”: Volterra (Province of Pisa), once a powerful Etruscan city. Among the many studies on this topic, see Camporeale and Maggiani 2009. The use of the name “Kitim” for Volterra, as well as several other words and data in the following part of the text, suggest that Tramonti frequently relied on Curzio Inghirami’s forged source. With respect to the word “Kitim,” for example, see C. Inghirami 1637, 7–8, 14, 19–21, 60, 132, 142, 302.

4Garfagnana is here described as “northern” (“aquilonaria regio”), as compared to the more southern Volterra.
herds. Our shepherds received Ligure, son of Phaeton, who had returned from a battle with a giant of the Anakim; and, having been taught to hunt by him, they survived the fierce monsters. Once converted to his cult of Jupiter and Osiris, they turned their cattle stables into castles and towns; having been disgusted by the cruelty of the Laestrygonian tyrants, and having accepted Apis Phoroneus as protector, they stained the Cimini Hills with Etruscan blood, and it was decided to name the Appennines after Apis; and [to call those] mountains Feroniani, from Phoroneus. The inhabitants of Garfagnana were considered to be loyal and very helpful to the Etruscan kings, from Morgetes to the cruel Mezentius; the Etruscan kingdom was divided into twelve provinces, just like the number of the main cities. Our people allied with Ocnus Bianor, and with the remaining rulers from Luna; having been summoned to fight the enemies of the Tyrrenian Republic, they won many victories against the Cenomani.

5 Ligure, or Ligisto. In Greek mythology, he was son of Phaeton (Φαέθων), who—in turn—was son of the god Apollo. He became the legendary king of a part of western Italy (hence the names “Liguria” and “Livorno”). See N. Magri and Santelli 1769, 26, 69.

6 From “Anakim” (“Sons of Anak”), a race of giants mentioned in the Bible. Arguably, “Enachio” comes from the distorted term “Enachii,” from Curzio Inghirami’s book (C. Inghirami 1637, 21–22), where this race is supposed to live in Etruria.

7 Jupiter (Iuppiter/Zeus), Latin and Greek god of sky and king of the gods.

8 Osiris, Egyptian god of the afterlife, resurrection, and of the underworld. According to Curzio Inghirami’s book, he defeated the Enachii with the aid of Apis, an Egyptian king. See C. Inghirami 1637, 22.

10 In Greek mythology, Apis (Ἀπίς) was an ancient king of Argos. He was son of the demigod Phoroneus (Φορωνεύς): first king of this land and inventor of fire, who contributed to the civilizing of the Italic peoples (see F. Inghirami 1825, 83–84). It is not clear whether or not Tramonti identifies the Greek Apis with the homonymous Egyptian king.

11 Monti Cimini (“Cimini Hills”), a range of volcanic hills located in the Province of Viterbo, northwest of Rome (about 55–60 kilometers, or 34–37 miles). They are not part of the Apennines, having an independent geological origin. On this topic, see Peccerillo 2005, 17, 19, 27, 37.

12 “Camesono”: From “Cameseuna,” which—according to Curzio Inghirami—was another name for Volterra. See C. Inghirami 1637, 142.

13 “Chorithis Tuscorum”: This term may refer both to the current Cortona (Province of Arezzo), once an Etruscan city, and to its legendary founder, king Coritus. See D’Aversa 1986; Valeriani and F. Inghirami 1833, 166. Here, this word could also indicate any generic Etruscan king or ruler.

14 According to Curzio Inghirami’s book (C. Inghirami 1637, 22, 29, 39, 50, 73, 193, 202, 206), Morgetes was the name of several Etruscan kings. In this passage, it is not clear which one Tramonti is referring to.

16 This passage alludes to the Etruscan League (or Dodecapolis), an alliance of twelve Etruscan cities that—according to the tradition—established a religious, economic, and military alliance in Etruria. The exact identity of these cities is still uncertain. On this topic, see Museo Claudio Faina 1985; Studi Etruschi ed Italici 2001.

17 Ocnus (Οκνος), or Bianor. In Latin and Greek mythology, he was son of the god Tiberunus. He founded and was the first king of Mantua: according to Virgil (Vergilius 2018a, X, 198–203, http://data.perseus.org/citations/urn:cts:latinLit:phi0690.phi003.perseus-lat1:10.198-10.214), he allied with Aeneas against the Italic tribe of the Rutuli.

18 Arguably, the Etruscan League.

19 Cenomani, also known as Aulerani Cenomani. This Celtic tribe once occupied a territory in the Cisalpine Gaul, between the Insulaires (on the west) and the Veneti (on the east).
the Allobroges,\textsuperscript{20} and the Celts, in the presence of the kings Titus Vulturrenus, Cecinna, and Menippus.\textsuperscript{21} After the Republic of Ianigeni\textsuperscript{22} was destroyed by Quintus Fabius Rullianus,\textsuperscript{23} the chief augurs of Garfagnana\textsuperscript{24} ordered to yield to the mountaineers of Liguria; together with these comrades, the Ligures from the mountains caused incredible damage to the inhabitants of Pisa, Lucca, Parma, and Modena, who were allies of the Roman Republic. Rome exhausted thirty pairs of consuls in the attempt to crush the Ligures, having seen its consul Petilius being killed and buried in Mount Balista, when, while his desperate legions from one side, and Laevinus’ cohorts from the other, were conquering the remnants of the mountain regions, they wounded and killed many, with the exception of those who [Petilius] had banished into the thickest forest around Mount Letum.\textsuperscript{25} And so the inhabitants of Garfagnana, having been the last of all Etruscans to be conquered, were forced to abandon the language of Iapetus,\textsuperscript{26} which not even the construction of Babel had confused, and which our ancestors had learned from Vadimonus Vertumnus;\textsuperscript{27} hence they kept this language secret, written with emphatic characters, so that it [still] needs to be revealed to posterity. After being enrolled in the Roman army, many people from Garfagnana became rich by looting enemies, and by profiting from military donations. Having been forbidden to cultivate the hills, in order to avoid the floods of the rivers, the mountaineers were provided with abundant wheat by the Latins; and, in turn, fed them with cattle. During

\textsuperscript{21}The term “lalartes” (plural of “larth”) is almost exclusively found in Curzio Inghirami’s book. Arguably, this is a distortion of the Latin/Etruscan word “lares,” plural of “larc” or “lars” (“lord”). According to this forged source (C. Inghirami \textsuperscript{1637}, 35–42, 48–54, 57–71, 74, 144, 183), the lalartes had administrative, military, and judicial powers in the Etruscan cities, and were elected by the kings (“lucumones”) and/or by the people and the Senate. As Tramonti states, Titus Vulturrenus, Cecinna, and Menippus were Etruscan “lalartes.”

\textsuperscript{22}Arguably, the author refers to the coalition defeated by the Romans. The name “Ianigeni” derives from the Italic deity Ianus, thus being a general definition for all the Italic peoples.

\textsuperscript{23}Most likely Quintus Fabius Maximus Rullianus (IV–III century BC), a Roman consul. From 310 to 295 BC, he fought and won several fierce and decisive battles against the Etruscans and their allies (Samnites, Umbrians, and Gauls), allowing Rome to dominate central Italy.

\textsuperscript{24}According to several sources, in ancient Rome and in Etruria the dorchetes were the wisest augurs: high priests who interpreted the will of the gods by observing the sky and the flight of birds. On this topic, see Ciatti \textsuperscript{1638}, 540; Marcucci \textsuperscript{1766}, 177; Tola \textsuperscript{1837}, 230; Vedriani \textsuperscript{1665}, 9. However, this could be another forgery from Curzio Inghirami’s book, where the word “dorchetes” is frequently used (C. Inghirami \textsuperscript{1637}, 42, 127, 235–238). Not by chance, all the above mentioned sources were published after the Etruscarum antiquitatum fragmenta. Moreover, Pasquale Tola explicitly considers Inghirami to be a reliable author (Tola \textsuperscript{1837}, 230).

\textsuperscript{25}This passage refers to a crucial episode in the Ligurian wars, when the Ligures were besieged by the Romans on “Mons Balista” (now Mount Valestra) and on “Mons Letum” (a mountain whose identity is still debated). According to Titus Livius in his Ab Urbe Condita (Livius \textsuperscript{2018}, XLI, 17–18, http://data.perseus.org/citations/urn:cts:latinLit:phi0914.phi000141.perseus-lat3:1), the two Roman consuls in charge at that time (176 BC) were Quintus Petilius Spurinus (who died in the battle) and Caius Valerius Laevinus. However, these names do not correspond to those mentioned in the manuscript. This discordance may be due to a transcription error by the author. “Rutilius” could be a distortion of “Pectilius”—which, in turn, could be a distorted version of “Petilius.” Thus, this name may actually refer to Quintus Petilius Spurinus. On the other hand, “Lentulus” could be a distortion of “Laevinus,” and, therefore, could mean Caius Valerius Laevinus.

\textsuperscript{26}The Etruscan language. From Iapetus (Ἰαπετός), a Titan in Greek mythology, son of the primordial deities Uranus (Ὀὐρανός) and Gaia (Γαῖα, or Γῆ). He was associated with the west, and, therefore, with the western peoples (as the Etruscans).

\textsuperscript{27}Vertumnus, an Etruscan and Roman god of seasons and change. According to several authors (including Tramonti), he was identified with the deity Vadimonus. See also Adami \textsuperscript{1737}, 68; Bardetti \textsuperscript{1769}, 4; Teoli \textsuperscript{1644}, 2–3.
the civil wars of Senators Marius, Sulla, Caesar, Pompey, and Mark Antony, many inhabitants of Garfagnana fled to shelters in their strongholds, and protected themselves in mountain castles; having been enriched by the money of the exiled nobles, they built new fortifications upon the old ones. The Christians who had been sentenced to face the wild beasts in the arena of Pisa, and who hid in caves and caverns, were present in word and deed; being safe from the Vandal and Gothic sackings, [the inhabitants] encountered the tyranny of the Longobards at first, and—eventually—their benevolence. After Etruria had been turned into a mark by the Emperor Louis II, the people of Garfagnana were ruled by Adalbert and by the subsequent margraves, down to the last Guelph imperial vicar; when an uncertain freedom was achieved under the German sovereigns, a great number of Italian communities adopted democracy, that our people agreed to share with the people of Lucca. Having been involved with the Guelph, Ghibelline, White, and Black factions, they almost destroyed each other and their belongings. The inhabitants of Garfagnana were so dear to the Duke of Lucca, Castruccio Castracani, that he chose one hundred of them as his body guards, and expanded Castelnuovo in Garfagnana. Once freedom from Lucca had been restored, Garfagnana seemed to revive a little; but as soon as the Republics of Lucca, Florence, Pisa, and Siena argued again, and, furthermore, [Paolo] Guinigi from Lucca tried to seize the territory, [even] the situation of [this] Republic began to deteriorate, and the people of Garfagnana feared a worse future: hence, by rebelling against the weakening government, in order to have a more durable defense with a stronger leader, and in the hope to partake in public affairs (from which the aristocracy had excluded the public), one part joined the Este, others the Medici Princes, and the rest sided with the closer dominant [faction]. Therefore, after every single ruler had been chosen by each side, according to their will and preference, they have served him until the present [time]. Indeed, these people love their princes: by which, in turn, they are privileged with a particular benevolence, [that allows them to] declare themselves happier than the other nations.

Religion of Garfagnana.

28 This passage refers to the great civil conflicts that scourged the late Roman Republic in the I century BC, resulting in the establishment of the Roman Empire: Sulla’s civil war; the war fought by Julius Caesar (100–44 BC) against the Senate and Gnaeus Pompeius Maior (106–48 BC); and the last one, which opposed Octavianus (who would become the first Roman Emperor, Augustus, 63 BC–14 AD) and Marcus Antonius (83–30 BC). In the aftermaths of these fluctuating events, many supporters of the losing factions were forced to escape from Rome, and not a few of them took shelter in Garfagnana.

29 According to Tramonti, Garfagnana was spared (relatively) from the destructive effects of the barbarian invasions of Italy during the fall of the Roman Empire.

30 Louis II of Italy (also known as Louis the Younger, 825–875), King of Italy and Holy Roman Emperor from 844 until his death.

31 Adalbert I (circa 820–884/6), Margrave of Tuscany and Tutor Corsicae from 846.

32 During the XIII and XIV centuries, Garfagnana was discontinuously occupied by the Republic of Lucca. This troubled sequence of events was part of a wider and complex context of struggles which took place in central and northern Italy between Guelphs and Ghibellines (and later, in Florence, between White and Black Guelphs). On this topic, see Pacchi [1785], 127–140.

34 Paolo Guinigi (1376–1432), powerful lord and, officially, Captain and Defender of the People (“Capitano e Difensore del Popolo”) of Lucca from 1400. See Pacchi [1785], 156–160.
Before the idols were invented by Ninus\textsuperscript{35} and Zoroaster,\textsuperscript{36} Etruria (which was called Tyrrenia in [Ancient] Greek, \textless\ldots\textgreater cricula in Latin) worshipped one god, as if [instructed] by a wise teacher; after that religion had been polluted through the people of Volterra,\textsuperscript{37} it changed the cult into idolatry; among the crowd of \textless\ldots\textgreater false deities, the inhabitants of this region chose Proserpina\textsuperscript{38} for themselves: as if they had thought to be worthy of the punishments of hell, but also as if they could move the pity of 10 omens of [the god] Erebus\textsuperscript{39} with [their] sacrifices. They called it Feronia, from the Apennines of Phoroneus, and because of the fertility of the land, the ferocity of the barbaric people, its forests, and the iron buskins of the priests; the piety of the inhabitants and the love for Feronia were such that not only did they want to call the sacred groves, the mountain passes, the festive days of Pales,\textsuperscript{40} and the entire region on this side of Mount Letum with the name of the deity, but called even themselves Feroniani. [Driven] by the zeal to spread the cult of Feronia, our people sent many priests up to Mount Soratte, not far from the land of cities: so that the name of Hecates\textsuperscript{41} would be celebrated far and wide in a new community [devoted to] the goddess, and so that the religion of Romulus could more easily pay its offerings to her temple. Surprisingly, among so many multitudes of gods that had been adopted by the other nations, the inhabitants of Garfagnana were the only people to continue worshipping just one deity: for this reason, the Prophet Jeremiah prophesied about them during an assembly (in Chapter 2 [of his Book]), when, while [speaking] of all the Italic [tribes], and especially of the Etruscan idolaters, he said to the Hebrews: “pass over to the islands of Kittim, and see if the people changed their gods”;\textsuperscript{42} and, above the rest, the Roman Pantheon, the new theogonies of other peoples, and even the preaching of the Apostles Peter and Paul, prove that the prophetic sarcasm was particularly true for our [people]; and then, after it had been rejected by so many sermons of the Saint Bishops Paulinus\textsuperscript{43} and Valerius,\textsuperscript{44} after it had been prohibited with so many violences, and though it had been explained with such great omens, the cult of Feronia revealed how tenaciously it was attached to the inhabitants of Garfagnana. When Christ died, no howling came from the \textsuperscript{35}Ninus, legendary Assyrian king and alleged founder of Nineveh. His wife was the likewise legendary queen Semiramis, who succeeded him after his death. On this topic, see Seymour \textsuperscript{2014}, 61–78, 115–116, 231.

\textsuperscript{37}“Chamesenos”: The inhabitants of Volterra. On this term, see note 12.

\textsuperscript{38}Proserpina (or Persephone, Περσεφόνη), also known as Cora (Κόρη, “maiden”). Along with her mother Ceres (or Demeter, Δημήτηρ), she was the Latin and Greek goddess of agriculture, vegetation, harvest, and fertility.

\textsuperscript{40}Parilia, or Pallilia: an ancient Roman festival held in honor of Pales, the patron deity of shepherds and flocks. On this topic, see Beard, North, and Price \textsuperscript{1998}, 174–176.

\textsuperscript{42}Book of Jeremiah, Chapter 2, verses 10–11. Actually, this passage does not refer to Etruria but to Kittim (Citium/Ktirou), an ancient settlement on the west coast of Cyprus. However, in Hebrew literature this name gradually acquired a wider meaning, referring to the whole island of Cyprus, to the Aegean Islands and, more broadly, to any invader coming from the Mediterranean islands (such as the Greeks, Macedonians, and the Romans). See Finkelstein and Silberman \textsuperscript{2001}, 348–351; Kugel \textsuperscript{1998}, 366–367, 950. Probably, Tramonti’s misinterpretation is due to the similarity between this biblical name and the word “Kitim,” which—according to Curzio Inghirami’s forged source—was the ancient name of Volterra.

\textsuperscript{43}Saint Paulinus (or Paulinus of Antioch, 1 century AD), first Bishop of Lucca (circa 46–68 AD) and patron saint of this city. On this topic, see Beverini \textsuperscript{1829}, 1–2, 30–34; \url{http://sacrumluce.sns.it/mv/html/MON/MON_990013000000000/frameset_cap3.html}.

\textsuperscript{44}Saint Valerius (1 century AD), disciple and successor of Paulinus as second Bishop of Lucca (circa 68–96 AD). See Beverini \textsuperscript{1829}, 35; \url{http://sacrumluce.sns.it/mv/html/MON/MON_990013000000000/frameset_cap3.html}.
wild beasts, no sounds from the evil spirits, no sudden exclamation from the soldiers, no tearful sacrifice from the inhabitants; nor did they want to abandon one of the thoughtless superstitions to which they were accustomed! Pyromancy was a common practice in Garfagnana; the recently introduced Apostolic Faith would require to be included with the stories of idols in the acts of the martyrs, if the Catholic Bishops Theodorus, Eutychianus, and the Irish Felicius had not endured, and had not kept the people of Garfagnana [within the limits] of a single [religious] nomenclature. Thus, once the magical enchantments had been abandoned, and after the statue of Proserpina had been torn down, they received the grace of baptism; yet, the name of Feronia would still linger in the sacred grove and in the temple of the adjacent, shady wood, if a royal, blessed Roman had not changed it with the name of the Forest, and Alp of Saint Peregrine, on account of his presence [in that place], and of [his] venerable tomb, after [his] death had been announced. Our people observed twenty-seven priests [carrying] his sanctified, noble body on a large tent, in admirable order; and, according to the will of Heaven, it was decided through them that the adorable hostage would remain on the soil of Garfagnana. During the Arian persecution, as well as during the Neronian, Domitian, and Maximian ones, [the inhabitants] hid the fleeing Christians in inaccessible caves and caverns, and fed them; and, among the very people of Garfagnana, there was no lack of those who, having been frightened by the violence of the tortments, had been torn by wild beasts while running into the woods, or had perished from hunger and thirst on remote slopes. In fact, it is certain that Garfagnana had many martyrs of blood (during the atheist [persecutions]) and charity (during epidemics), that the flame of faith, and the hesitation of others, had prematurely sent to glory. During the ecclesiastical schisms, our forefathers protected many bishops in the strongholds of Garfagnana; and when peace had been restored to the Church, they cared for the renovation of temples, the building of parishes, the foundation of monasteries, the construction of oratories, the provision of pilgrim hospitals, so that the people of Garfagnana proved to be no less remarkable for [their] piety, than for the obstinacy of [their early] idolatry. In the course of time, they obtained the bodies of Saint Blancus, Saint Vivianus, Saint Terentius, Saint Prim-

45Pyromancy, an ancient practice of divination by fire.
47Arguably, Pope Eutychianus (228–283 AD), who was from Luni. See Repetti 1843, 193.
49The passage refers both to the violent struggles among Christians in the III and IV centuries AD, between the followers of the presbyter Arius (Arianism) and the supporters of the Nicene Creed (adopted after the First Council of Nicaea in 325 AD), and to the persecutions of Christians carried out during the reigns of the Roman Emperors Nero (37–68 AD), Domitianus (51–96 AD), and Maximianus (250–310 AD). However, this last name could also—and more likely—allude to Galerius (whose official title, in fact, was Gaus Galerius Valerius Maximianus Augustus, 250/260–311 AD): a renowned and fierce opponent of Christianity.
50Saint Blancus, Saint Peregrine’s only companion.
51Saint Vivianus (or Saint Vianus, VI–VII century), who settled in a still existing hermitage in the Apuan Alps. According to tradition, he met with Saint Peregrine and Saint Blancus.
Saint Primitivus, Saint Ercolano, Saint Irenaeus, and the relics of many others. Furthermore, Garfagnana delighted in the most exemplary behavior of such venerable priests as Giambattista d’Este, Giacobbe Jacopucci, Bartolomeo Guidi, Barsotti, Bertacchi, and Cillei, of whose fragrance it is still redolent.

Names, and surnames, of the noble Romans from which the towns of Garfagnana inherited [their] denominations, starting from the older ones.

First
In the Vicariate of Camporgiano, Modena.
1. Lucius Murena—Lucignano.
2. Cassius Viscellinus—Ghivizano.
5. Q. Elius Tubero—Tereglio.

53 Saint Primitivus (III century?), martyr. His cult is particularly vivid in Castelnuovo di Garfagnana. See Vinceti 2007, 86.
54 Blessed Ercolano da Piegaro (?–1451), a Franciscan friar from Perugia who settled in Garfagnana. See Angelini 1990.
55 Saint Irenaeus (?–?), martyr. His body, now preserved in Castiglione di Garfagnana, was carried from Rome and donated to the city in 1680 by the influential Guazzelli family (see http://www.castiglione-news.it/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=697:langolo-del-passato-piccola-ricerca-su-santireneo&catid=57:langolo-del-passato&Itemid=76).
56 Alfonso II d’Este (1591–1644), Duke of Modena and Reggio from 1628 to 1629. He abdicated in favour of his son Francesco (1610–1658) and entered the Capuchin friars with the name of Giambattista da Modena. He died in Castelnuovo di Garfagnana. On this topic, see Tiraboschi 1825, 131.
57 No biographical data were found about this person (arguably, he was a priest or a friar).
58 Bartolomeo Guidi (XVII century), a priest from Barga. From 1651 to 1658, he was parish priest of the Pieve di Santa Maria, a Romanesque church in Loppia (now a hamlet in the municipality of Barga). On this topic, see P. Magri 1881, 71.
59 Most likely, one of the many ecclesiastic members of the Barsotti, a powerful family from Lucca. On this topic, see Barsotti 1693, Catalano 2007, 120–121, 131–132, 148, 158.
